Curate your home in haute boho

For years, California's boho-chic signature style was dominating every magazine spread, Pinterest board, even major retailer catalog - some might say ad nauseam.

But as the proliferation of macrame wall hangings, batik pillows and Beni Ourain rugs spread like wildfire in our decor vernacular, another trend crept up in homes everywhere: monochrome minimalism. Suddenly, brightly colored, eclectic spaces were pared back with almost superhuman restraint - to the point where we were left wondering: Does anyone even live here?

Despite the recent rise of minimal, modern and Scandinavian influences in our homes, many signs point to traditional decor making a comeback in 2018. One of the most frequent resonating themes this year, from interviews with famed interior designers to polls among our Instagram followers, demanded one thing from decor trends in 2018: a broader mix of periods and styles and an approach to decor that felt more authentic and personable. After all, once the pendulum swings too far on one side, it has no choice but to swing back.

One recently released decor book, "Haute Bohemians," by famed interior photographer Miguel Flores-Vianna, goes beyond the simple return of traditional decor by reintroducing bohemian style with a more authentic, individualistic approach. You won't find any instant decor formulas for boho-chic style in this book. Instead, you'll find a collection of worldly homes photographed throughout the years - each wildly different from the other, but all tied together with one common thread: that of a deeply individual eclectic style paying homage to the city it lives in, the architectural period of the building, and the quirky personal style of its owner.

Wondering how to curate your home like a true haute bohemian? We highlighted some of our favorite interiors below - from Argentina to Paris - along with a few helpful tips.
